Data Disturbances
While markets were calm today, the rest of the week, maybe not. Tomorrow, the Fed’s favorite inflation measure (core personal consumption expenditure inflation) comes out, on Wednesday the Fed probably announces a quarter-point cut in rates (first time since 2008), on Friday, July job growth is announced. All are temporally profoundly important data points at this economic juncture and will move markets if they are different than what is expected.

Good GDP
19Q2 GDP came in at 2.1%, which, while a big decline from 3.1% in 19Q1, is in line with the 2.3% average over the entire record-breaking 121-month recovery we are enjoying. Business spending was negative, the first time since 16Q1, and exports declined due to trade tensions, slowing global growth and waning tax cut impacts. Importantly, consumer spending, by far the biggest driver of growth, is strong! The recovery continues.

Rate Reduction
Earlier today, the Fed did what markets expected; cut rates by a quarter-point. However, the Fed was very sloppy in elucidating why. I might call its explanation "coalescing around some convenient potential rationales" like global slowing. Thus, Powell was utterly unable to explain to markets what variables the Fed will be paying close attention to, and more importantly, how many more rate reductions there might be in this rate-cutting cycle.
